I have an endpoint in my web app which will give out a JSON file. The file is large so it's best if the API is async and gives a handler for the request and once that is done it will return the JSON back. router.get('/data', (req, res) => { if (typeof req.body.data === 'undefined') { res.json({}); } else { const data = req.body.data; let cb = (err, data) => { if (err) { console.log(err); } else { res.json(data);

The DMT 'experience' is reported by many as being similar to a 'near death' experience. These reports suggest that people can undergo 'near death' experiences while in the same time consciousness is in transit. At the time of death, consciousness is reported as entering the river of time. Here consciousness does not 'die' in a 'crystal ball' like reality, but is thought to enter a 'forgetting mind'. A 'forgetting mind' in which we exist in a magical, yet still a conscious, state. We exist as though on another level; a 'level of the mind', and then the ego is thought to no longer be a separate entity to this mind. This entity is then thought to dissolve and disappear. Here our consciousness is said to be on the verge of entering 'the river of time'. Here consciousness is thought to become 'immortal' at the core, where it becomes the 'immortal universe'. Life, consciousness, death, and after-death consciousness are all thought to be able to exist in this state. In the experience that is supposedly given by DMT, consciousness is thought to move from the 'near death experience' into this other level. The physical brain, in the traditional interpretation, is thought to provide consciousness with 2d92ce491b
