The term "Chinese herb" is sometimes used to refer to "Korean herb." However, both "Korean herb" and "Chinese herb" refer to the same plant, Aconite. Impact of P-glycoprotein overexpression in human renal cell carcinomas on intratumoral and regional drug disposition, and efficacy. The ability of renal cell carcinoma (RCC) to express the drug efflux pump P-glycoprotein (Pgp) is considered to be a reason for high incidence of acquired resistance to chemotherapy. However, this does not preclude the possibility of a positive response to Pgp substrates. In this study the subcellular distribution of the drugs was determined in RCC with and without Pgp overexpression. Moreover, the influence of Pgp overexpression on the antineoplastic efficacy of a Pgp substrate (cisplatin (cDDP)) and a non-Pgp substrate (gemcitabine (GEM)) was investigated. Therefore, RCC cell lines with different levels of Pgp expression were used. Intratumoral and regional distribution of the drugs were quantified by high-performance liquid chromatography (HPLC) and fluorescence microscopy. Drug efficacy was determined by the growth delay assay. In RCC cells with Pgp overexpression, the intracellular and regional distribution of GEM increased by 59.6% and 46.7%, respectively, and that of cDDP increased by 85.0% in the intracellular compartment and by 21.6% in the renal proximal tubular cells. However, the total drug amount decreased in tumor cells with Pgp overexpression. The drug efficacy of GEM decreased by 3.7-fold and that of cDDP decreased by 2.1-fold in RCC cells with Pgp overexpression. Intratumoral and regional drug distribution and drug efficacy are closely connected with the expression of Pgp in RCC cells. The results suggest a strategy to
