Though the blockage of privacy-invasive banners is the primary reason to install the extension, the extension can come in handy for quite a different use case. One could say that cookies, tracking-scripts and other usually invasive scripts are dumped in the cookie background and when you do something that may make some kind of performance impact, a whitelist may help. If you use such a cookie-heavy site and you do not want to wait for your computer to start responding because every click or navigation causes the system to lag, then the whitelist feature may prevent such a lag from happening. Best of luck! For Firefox: Ninja Cookie is designed to help you stay safe and anonymous while browsing the web. It shows a popup when it recognizes and suggests to stop cookies that can be used to track your activity or for purposes that are not required. This extension for Firefox automatically closes cookie warnings. Works in private browsing mode. Features a customizable settings window. Includes a wide range of whitelists and blacklists for greater control of its action. The advantage of this extension is that it blocks cookies from all sites when installed, and it also stops those that it refuses to be a part of. Because it is an add-on, its

Allows you to reject the installation of non-essential cookies that are set on the visited websites. Saves you unneeded clicks. Refuses non-essential cookies to protect your privacy. Is Ninja Cookie scam or safe to use? I am neither an affiliate nor a representative of this tool. I have just found its user reviews on the Mozilla website. At the very least, I think it is not a scam. Ninja Cookie user reviews: Chrome Firefox It works for me on Chrome. What about the "Google Window" and the "Google URL Bar"? I tested it on the most popular browsers as well, namely, Google Chrome (as it is the one I used for all of the tests), Safari, Mozilla Firefox, and Internet Explorer. From my tests, the extension didn't interfere with the Google URL bar or anything else that is related to Google products. However, you might get a pop-up notification if your browser window has the Google branding in it, as Ninja Cookie provides that functionality. If you find it annoying to have your navigation buttons blocked because it happens to overlap with the Google URL bar in your browser window, a good solution to that is to uncheck a few settings. One that I suggest is to check the setting that shows all the cookies that are stored in your browser. Click on the ellipsis button in the url bar (it looks like three vertical dots) to see the below. Next, press the Backspace button on your keyboard to open the settings tab. There, uncheck the option "Allow cookies". Then, press the Backspace button again to exit the window. Now that you have eliminated the options to use cookies in your browser, you can continue your browsing as you normally do. Also, you can find the Ninja Cookie settings by clicking on the three vertical dots in the url bar, which will open the settings window. Are there any alternatives to Ninja Cookie for Firefox? I don't think so, unless you are looking for an extension that blocks the notifications displayed by the cookie banners. That would be the only thing I am aware of.
