They fought for states, for industries, for ideology, and for the relative political positions of the two groups. They also fought for pride, for property, and for honor. They fought for the right to continue the rebellion. And, as their numbers began to grow and victories brought them into the southland, they fought for money. But the Union Army could not sustain itself. There were no recurring subsidies for the war, no quotas that stretched year to year and the nation straining to meet the demands of the conflict. There were no high expectations and the people accepted the situation. They only suffered. The armies of the Confederacy, however, were not limited to merely fighting. In addition to the usual military challenges, they engaged in expedient measures of political engagement. They robbed, threatened, and even murdered for no other reason than to create financial troubles for the Union. The political capital they created on the battlefield was not met by the same degree on the home front. Until the advent of the Civil War, the Federal government was considered to have little money to expend on military expenditures. President Lincoln was dependent on the states to fund the war, and in his first two years, they often balked at allocating any money to the federal cause. This changed as public awareness of and support for the war grew. A Federal draft was enacted in 1862, but the immediate questions the need raised could not be sustained. By the third year of the conflict, shortages of food and shoes created a crisis of considerable proportions. It was against this background that the Confederate military engaged in an audacious, yet ill-advised scheme to steal federal funds for its cause. Into the context of the war is thrust the legacy of the derrick company. The Derrick Company was an Illinois-based firm that made
