It takes...The circle goes round and round....and why it happens. The use of a microvolt difference (ma) is proposed as a new component in excitatory and inhibitory postsynaptic receptor functions. It is of the order of those elementary voltage steps which make up a synaptic potential and so by dividing receptor potentials into an elementary contribution, we may define certain properties of synaptic transmission. The parameter is proposed as indicative of receptor 'charge' and as an obligatory integral part of the post-synaptic response (in the absence of any other action potential). The concept is related to the biological interpretation of a parameter called the membrane threshold potential. Considerable experience has been obtained with this parameter on P/Q and N-type channels. However, we demonstrate that the same value is obtained using both the threshold potential and ma, and that, as a consequence, the value is the same for any channel type. On Our Radar On Our Radar Five Things Mark Cuban Does That Don't Help Him
