GNU Free Documentation License The GNU Free Documentation License (GNU FDL, free documentation license, or fdl) is a free software license for free documentation published with a program or library. The term is also used to refer to the license under which the GNU manuals are released. The GNU FDL was drafted on November 11, 1991, by the Free Documentation License Working Group, of which William E. Tresh, Lynn W. Church, and Peter H. Salus were members. At the time, it was released as an Internet Draft, which is the precursor to a text draft. It was merged in version 1.2 of the GNU General Public License in 1994, and was made the default license by Linus Torvalds in version 2.0.1 of the Linux kernel in 1998. The original license's purpose was to promote a change in the way free software was developed, which is still present today. The license "enables users to copy and distribute freely manuals of computer programs under such terms as they judge appropriate, and thus to give all who wish the freedom to do so without cost." and "permits programs to copy and distribute modified versions, and to use the modified versions for any purpose, provided that the license notice, the copyright notice, and this paragraph are retained and the modified software is marked as such." License and criticism The GNU FDL license is governed by a set of files which follow the license (namely the License.txt file) and a set of rules. The FDL defines four basic types of documentation that can be included, along with three special cases. If the documentation describes a software program or library, it is to be licensed using the GNU FDL. Generally, the program or library must provide the three basic cases of documentation (information, instructions, and function names and descriptions). A special "extension" of the FDL governs documentation describing a product, as if it were a program. Also, a special "extension" of the FDL governs a reference documentation that otherwise complies with the FDL. These three extensions are the GNU Free Documentation License, the GNU Free Documentation License for Products, and the GNU Free Documentation License for Documentation. Finally, the FDL defines three special cases that do not fall under any of the four basic types. The free documentation provided with a public-domain program or library, for example, must not be made to be included within the GNU FDL.

What's New In?

You can't make this stuff up. Photo via Wikimedia Kellyanne Conway, who was Donald Trump's campaign manager, recently suggested that the president "maybe" has a chance at winning the popular vote, and that the Electoral College is "problematic" and "unfair." "Donald Trump did win the Electoral College while Hillary Clinton won the popular vote," she explained to Fox News's Bill O'Reilly, who prompted her to elaborate. "Was he cheated?" O'Reilly asked Conway. "Well, there are some people who believe that, Bill," she said, explaining that the popular vote includes all non-voters and "people who vote for third parties and write someone else in." "And so the cheating could be there. It's problematic. It's why the Founding Fathers put the Electoral College in the Constitution," she added. O'Reilly asked her to explain. "It gives us a mechanism for how we would select our president without giving the smaller states, who are important, you know, little, a little bit more power and influence," Conway said. "What does that mean? Don't you think it's undemocratic?" O'Reilly asked. "Do you want a candidate to win the popular vote that hasn't won the Electoral College?" she said. "No, but that's not the way we do it. We understand how the system works," O'Reilly replied. Conway continued to explain what she meant. "I think it's problematic. I think it's something that's unfair. Because you know, the Electoral College, Bill, it's 270 electoral votes to five on the Supreme Court," she said. Conway went on to explain how the system works. "So that's how it's set up, and it's good that it's set up that way," she concluded. It certainly is strange how someone who was tasked with electing Donald Trump to the White House would claim that somehow the election is not legitimate because
