So in there I have a singleton class that is being called many times a day. I have being doing some load testing. I have found that in say 10 minutes I have to call this service many hundreds of times. I am concerned that it can cause problems. Is this a bad idea? A: Singletons aren't a problem in and of themselves, but when done incorrectly they can prove very harmful in distributed systems. Exercise in Coding Conventions I wouldn't recommend creating an object (singleton or otherwise) that is hard-coded in your code and used everywhere you need it. Instead, I'd create a class with configuration/logic/behaviors/etc that is used as needed. If you store it in a common class, it can be more easily versioned and distributed, and easily used in multiple places at once. Create a service and a global singleton
