Delta was one of the first air carriers to report a drop in the number of passengers it is carrying during the recent travel slump. But CEO Richard Anderson thinks the airline industry is going to emerge from a difficult year healthier than it was last fall. "We see a stabilizing period in this cycle," he told CNBC. "We think we're going to be OK." The travel industry has been suffering as consumers in countries like China, Hong Kong and mainland China are taking far more trips than ever before — and looking for quality experiences rather than convenience. The industry has been buffeted by geopolitical incidents and the slowdown in China, a key market for airlines. Travel restrictions imposed on the Chinese mainland by the White House, government officials and airlines have driven air fares down by more than 20 percent on routes between China and the U.S. in the last week alone. Delta saw a 27 percent decline in passenger traffic for the last three months of 2016, Anderson said. He said the airline expects 2018 to be on a better path, with an increase of 7 to 8 percent in traffic. That's in line with what global travel agency industry leader Phocuswright expects as well. The airline industry has been trying to replace losses from cancelled flights with more profitable leisure trips. Delta executives have said that with the rising yield from leisure trips, the airline is on track to turn a profit in 2018. The airline industry is looking to attract more corporate and leisure travelers with more perks to replace travel budgets with family and friends. Delta also has been trying to improve its fortunes with a new plan that will reduce 3e33713323
