Docosahexaenoic acid (DHA, C22:6n-3) is a polyunsaturated fatty acid with health benefits. It is a member of marine algae, and is limited in human. Therefore, we designed a method to prepare microcapsules of DHA, which have potential applications in food and cosmetic industry. We used interfacial cross-linking methods, and the effects of cross-linking degree and cross-linking agent dosage on the properties of microcapsules were investigated. The results indicated that our method is a simple and effective means to prepare microcapsules of DHA. The microcapsule could be a stable colloidal dispersion with the recovery of 75%, and the encapsulation efficiency could reach to 90% with use of 12% cross-linking agent. The porous structure of the microcapsule was analyzed with use of scanning electron microscopy, and the corresponding results of tensile strength test showed that there was an obvious difference between different cross-linking degree. Biogenic amines and their role in ingestional intoxications. Ingestional intoxication due to food is still not a well-known public health problem and is usually described only as a medical emergency. In this review we have given a broad overview of the significance of biogenic amines, mainly biogenic amine catabolism products such as catecholamines and serotonin and their precursors. In case of ingestional intoxication the biochemical diagnosis has to include the determination of biogenic amines in serum or urine. The knowledge on the analytical performance of the currently available commercial assays for the biogenic amines in the routine clinical laboratory will be briefly discussed. The specific features of the clinical picture of ingestional intoxications caused by certain biogenic amines will be given. The forensic toxicological examination of the involved food and blood samples will be briefly discussed. Q: How to add a group admin for specific users in groups.rb in Rails 4? Prof. Christopher Duffy, the author of The Bottom Billion: Why the Poorest Countries Are Failing and What Can Be Done About It, joins guest host Harold Meyerson to discuss the world's poor. Duffy defends the "cash transfer program" approach to poverty alleviation, in which the poor get a check for a predetermined sum a year to be spent however they wish. But in so doing, Duffy argues, the program amounts to a welfare state, and its negative effects include stagnation of the market, stagnation of the economy, further entrenchment of the poor, and reduced levels of GDP on the theory that the market is more efficient when welfare recipients are kept alive. Duffy's message is that poverty alleviation
