Although Fas/CD95 (APO-1) has been shown to be important for both cell-mediated and humoral immunity, its function in the innate immune response is still poorly understood. Thus, to further delineate the role of this receptor in the innate immune response, we generated CD95-deficient mice. In the present study, we examined the expression and function of CD95 antigen in normal and disease-prone mice. By immunohistochemical analysis, CD95 was constitutively expressed in a subset of phagocytic cells and perivascular cells in the central nervous system (CNS) and spleen of normal mice. In peripheral blood mononuclear cells (PBMCs), CD95 was expressed on more than 95% of lymphocytes. The expression of CD95 on these cells was not regulated by mitogenic stimulation. Interestingly, as shown by RT-PCR analysis, CD95 was also detected in lymphocytes separated from liver, kidney, bone marrow, spleen, and peritoneum of mice with cecal ligation and puncture (CLP)-induced peritonitis. Importantly, apoptosis of PBMCs isolated from CD95-deficient mice was not significantly decreased compared with that of control mice with normal CD95 expression. Mice deficient in CD95 showed no apparent differences in the clinical course of peritonitis as assessed by mortality, weight loss, serum levels of interleukin (IL)-6, IL-10, and tumor necrosis factor alpha (TNF-alpha), or the number of bacteria in the peritoneum. These data demonstrate that the constitutive expression of CD95 by certain subsets of nonlymphoid cells in the CNS, and constitutive expression of CD95 by lymphocytes in the
