Q: Does closing 'Save' or 'Discard Changes' on the FF checkout page also remove the need to submit form? Say I have a form that I can submit by pressing 'Save' or 'Discard Changes'. Say I submit this form and change some data in the meantime. I then go to the checkout page and click 'Discard Changes'. In the new browser window, I don't have to fill in anything again. My question is, does that mean I can save a revision of this checkout page without having to submit the form again? A: You are correct, it does. If you read the help page, I quote: If you navigate away from the last revision while it is open in your browser, you can reload the page by clicking the Redo button. If you decide you want to keep the changes that were made, click the Back arrow to return to your last revision and click Save. If you save the page and then reopen it, it will revert to the last saved revision. Well this is embarrassing. Needless to say, the Indian economy is set for a pretty rough landing. Current estimates show that the economy will slow down at a pace of 6.5% for the next three quarters. This is down from 7.9% recorded in Q2 2017. In fact, GDP growth is set to be at its weakest post-reform period since April 2014, when the economy was in the midst of the demonetisation controversy. To make matters worse, the US Federal Reserve, which has long been a staunch supporter of the Indian economy (India being the US's largest trading partner) has warned that the Indian economy may suffer from the uncertainties of the Trump administration. Shrinking Sensex to 7-month low The downfall of the Indian rupee on Wall Street has resulted in a 30-40 basis point depreciation of the rupee, which has reduced the value of Indian exports and has lowered the competitiveness of the Indian economy. While the official data for Q2 2017 showed that the exports by the Indian economy expanded by 7.6% on a quarter-on-quarter basis, the latest data suggest that the rates have contracted at a much sharper pace of -4.1% QoQ. Thus, on a yearly basis, the export growth was at 4.9% in Q2 2017 compared to 5.
