In vitro effect of gamma radiation on Pseudomonas aeruginosa. The effect of gamma radiation was studied with dry matter, live cultures, and spores of Pseudomonas aeruginosa in five pH and two water activity values. Irradiation had variable effects in terms of total viable counts, total suspended solids, removal of pyocyanin, and regrowth of the bacterial population. However, there was a reduction in total viable counts with less than 0.1 kGy of exposure at all water activity values and pH values used. Regrowth of the bacterial population occurred at doses of 0.1 to 1.0 kGy when the water activity was 0.95, while there was no regrowth at any dose when the water activity was 0.6. The effect was different in terms of total bacterial counts when the bacterial population was suspended in milk or lactose. In the case of dry matter values, there was no significant reduction in bacterial counts at any dose used, although the bacterial population in lactose was somewhat reduced by gamma radiation. Pyroptically dry matter did not affect microbial survival, but there was a significant dose-related reduction in microbial counts when the bacterial population was suspended in milk and lactose. There was some indication that the efficacy of gamma radiation for treating and controlling clinical cases of infection caused by P. aeruginosa may be improved by using dry matter or a combination of dry matter and radiation inactivation as treatment.
