FIFA 20 captured over 100,000 real-life player moves, with the aim to capture and apply the emotion of the match to players, in both offensive and defensive gameplay. This can range from the tactical sophistication of controlling the ball, right through to the physicality of being able to make an impact in the tackle. "You're always going to have players who make you giggle, like Jimmy Greaves, if you've not seen it," said Patrick Strudwick, FIFA's Head of AI Programming. "Others are going to have some of the more bizarre moves, which you feel like your character has just had your foot shorn off, but it's made in the right spirit. We always use reality in our gameplay, so while the animation we've created might not be accurate, it's there to give you a taste of what a player really does." As well as using motion capture data, FIFA's AI engine has also been used to create the first-ever true 360 degree passing trajectories, which can help inform and control passing and movement in the wider pitch. "What we've done is take that player data and use machine learning algorithms to come up with the best passing decision, whether that's for close-range passes or long-range passes," Strudwick said. "It's not a case of just letting the player decide which one to make, the AI decides based on what the player can do, and the player can build on that and can influence the decision by where it goes." The AI also captures everything that happens from a high level from possession and will make decisions on how to play, rather than just react to what happens to the ball. "If you watch a player like James Milner, for example, he starts off with the ball under pressure, and then one of his midfielders starts to run on, he can then decide if he should go and block that midfielders run, if he can play a quick pass through, to a central midfielder running on, or he can kick it directly at an opponent," Strudwick said. "The AI makes all those decisions based on what players can do and how each situation might present itself, with the ball under pressure, under pressure, so it gives you a choice that a
