In Campbell, the plaintiff police officer was injured when he fell from a building after being shot by a suspect. Id. at 247. The City and State argued that the district court had erred in its assessment of the applicable standard of care because the plaintiff's expert "did not have an adequate basis for stating that the standard of care governing police officers working a high-rise building [was] higher than the standard of care of ordinary citizens under the same conditions." Id. at 251. In resolving this dispute, we held that the district court's ruling should be affirmed. Id. at 252. Relying on Campbell, the State argues that Molitor did not have an adequate basis for asserting an expert was needed to prove that Lakewood's building maintenance standards were higher than the general standard of care. think the evidence indicates the need for an expert. As a preliminary matter, the State argues that Molitor never "raised this objection at trial[,]" because he did not object to the City's failure to produce requested medical records and Lakewood had not objected that an expert was required to testify. The district court found that Molitor objected to the City's failure to produce the request for medical records or to produce the expert to testify. On appeal, the State contends that Molitor's objections were "narrow" and were limited to the lack of records and the exclusion of Molitor's expert testimony. Molitor repeatedly argued that the City was required to produce the request for medical records from Temple to Lakewood. He noted the request was in the City's possession and that the City had not been excluded from the discovery process. He argued that the records were relevant to the issue of medical causation because it
