Los Angeles mayor Eric Garcetti has said that it is “appropriate” to use public funds to pay for the legal defense of a man charged with rape and other crimes against a teenager, despite the city’s policy of not paying for such cases. “I do have to say that given the case being prosecuted by the Los Angeles County district attorney’s office... it is certainly appropriate to use public funds in that defense,” the mayor said Friday, according to the L.A. Times. “How else can we defend our children but with public funds?” he asked. “This man has been charged with rape and multiple other charges for sexual crimes against a young teenage girl.” Lydia Villaume, a spokeswoman for the district attorney’s office, told Fox News that the city will be funding the legal defense for alleged rapist Henry Solis. The 46-year-old was also charged with burglary, trespassing and robbery on May 22, just days after being released from jail following his arrest in April. Additionally, he has allegedly targeted at least 10 other women in the past. Solis’ lawyer told Fox News that he had set up a crowdfunding site on Indiegogo to raise money for the legal defense. Garcetti defended his decision to fund Solis’ legal defense, saying he believes that he will “be cleared of all criminal liability.” “Because our city attorney’s office is charged with the duty to defend him — and under the charter, it does — there are no other public defenders that could take the case,” he said. Los Angeles has an ordinance in which defendants are not supposed to be represented by private counsel without approval from the city attorney’s office. “We certainly do not have the resources to pay for private attorneys to defend people who have been arrested and charged in criminal cases,” the mayor told the Times. “I’m not hiding that this is a very difficult case,” he said. “I don’t want to play into the right-wing fear that this is some sort of nefarious plot.” But an analysis by the Los Angeles Times says that Solis has good legal representation. Kevin Bradley, the attorney who is representing Solis, told the Times that Solis would not be facing
