Reason: Add April Fool's Day jokeHydrogen sulfide reverses oxidative stress of the ethanol-induced liver injury in rats. The main objective of this study was to assess the protective effect of hydrogen sulfide (H₂S) against ethanol-induced oxidative stress, hepatic injury and mitochondrial dysfunction. For this purpose, Wistar rats were divided into: control (C), ethanol-treated (Et), E + S-sulphydryl group (E + SH), E + HS-synthase inhibitor (Et + PAG) and E + NaHS (Et + NaHS). Morphological and biochemical results were obtained. The activities of the enzymes associated with antioxidant status (superoxide dismutase, catalase and GSH-Px), lipid peroxidation (LPO) and the ultrastructure of the cell were evaluated. The results showed that the Et group demonstrated marked changes in liver structure. The activities of the enzymes associated with antioxidant status increased in the Et + NaHS group. The activities of the enzymes associated with antioxidant status increased in the Et + NaHS group. Additionally, LPO levels decreased in the Et + NaHS group compared with the Et group. Our findings showed that the addition of NaHS during ethanol-induced liver injury reversed oxidative stress, hepatic injury and mitochondrial dysfunction. Role of Ca²⁺ transport in the acute toxicity of heavy metals and in the induction of apoptosis by heavy metals in mouse preimplantation embryos. Heavy metals are known to induce apoptosis in various cell types. The present study was designed to investigate the effects of heavy metals (Pb, Cd, Ni, Zn, and Cu), which are major environmental pollutants, on the apoptosis of preimplantation mouse embryos. The in vivo role of Ca(2+) was also investigated in the same system. The in vivo response of preimplantation mouse embryos after in utero exposure to heavy metals was analyzed using the 3H-thymidine (3 b7e8fdf5c8
