A good resource to start exploring the power of image manipulation in Photoshop is the User's Guide to Photoshop CS6 (from the Adobe website at `www.adobe.com`), which is available from Adobe Press for a suggested retail price of $29.99. Two professional Photoshop programs exist (one for each platform): PhotoShop CC (for Mac OS X) and Photoshop CS6 (for Windows). You can use them both for laying out and editing images, among many other things. However, Photoshop CC is a pay-per-license software, whereas Photoshop CS6 is a downloadable program. It gives you the benefit of using Photoshop CC in addition to Photoshop CS6 for free. ## Laying Out an Image The first step to creating an image in Photoshop is to set up the document. In this case, I create a new document and set the canvas size to 2 inches by 3 inches — see Figure 4-1. (You can set the canvas size to any size or leave it at its default size.) **Figure 4-1:** Use your tools of choice to lay out your image. Photoshop CS6 organizes layers. You can set a background layer, which is visible by default, and an active layer on which you work. Any layers that are not currently active are hidden and not visible. Layers are available in four categories: Background, Color, Gradient, and Path. When you're working on an image, you select an area of the image and move it over to another area of the document with the Move tool (the black arrow in the image) or press and hold down the left mouse button on the tool icon that appears in the toolbox and drag. If you do a lot of image manipulation, you may need to arrange multiple layers to enable you to work on a variety of aspects of a particular image at the same time. Photoshop has four Layers: the Background layer, the Color layer, the Gradient layer, and the Path layer. The following sections guide you through the process of using and layering your tools to create a new image.

The bill is part of a package called Fair Public Education Act to strengthen public schools in New Jersey, which was signed into law by the governor last week. The new law, which was passed unanimously by the Legislature, will allow lawmakers to allocate funds in districts with low student achievement, called identified underperforming schools (I.O.S.) to provide funds for other districts deemed to have a “distinguished achievement profile” or D.A.P. The first group of districts to receive the funds are ones with an I.O.S. In fiscal year 2012-13, the bill will provide more than $200 million to districts with a D.A.P. Gov. Chris Christie signed the bill into law this week. As a result of the funding disparity, districts in the first group of districts with an I.O.S. will receive a revenue increase, while districts in the second group of districts will receive a rebate. Superintendent of Schools Gregory Thornton said the law will give students the same opportunity to have a great education as those who live in the suburban school districts. “These students deserve the same opportunity to get an excellent education as any student,” he said. “In order to
