The ruling by a Shanghai court last month came as news organizations have become increasingly vocal in their criticism of the Chinese government. The newspaper pleaded guilty and agreed to pay the fine. Its director, Wang Kai, said the judgment did not appear to be about the newspaper's content. "If the court took it into consideration, they wouldn't have issued the ruling," he said. "There was no news story or expose, so it can't be a punishment for that." Wang said he would consider appealing. His attorney, Li Wenliang, said the court ruling shows "how confident the government is that it can control what the people can say." The online service law makes it illegal to disseminate information about a specific individual without that person's consent. According to the China Daily, the newspaper published an online news article reporting on an online video in which a private medical school rescinded a job offer to a government-recommended candidate after seeing a comment criticizing the state. China's Internet regulator has ordered more than 500 websites and blogs to delete posts last month that it said were inciting subversion of state power.Q: Отправка данных через виджет Каким образом можн
