The present invention relates to an adjustable support or headrest for use in conjunction with a bed, and more particularly to an adjustable support or headrest having a continuous adjustable height adjustment which compensates for the tolerance variations encountered during the mass production of parts for an adjustable support of this type. Adjustable support devices, including headrests, have been known for some time. Known headrests for adjusting to different patient heights may include a rod which is adjustable in height by tightening or loosening a nut or cam type of arrangement to raise or lower the headrest. In certain designs, adjustable heights are achieved by using a threaded hole and a headlamp with a solid circular wall. These designs suffer the disadvantage of not being accurate to any given tolerance. Some designs accomplish a continuous height adjustment by clamping two metal plates together with a nut and bolts to raise and lower the headrest. These devices are able to achieve a precise and accurate continuous adjustment to a given tolerance, however, they are expensive and cumbersome to adjust and service. The present invention is directed to an improved continuous height adjustable support or headrest including a pair of L-shaped metal plates which are joined by spaced apart horizontal flanges and fastened together by a pair of nuts and bolts. The vertical distance between the head and the support in which the headrest is supported is measured by a micrometer which extends between the nuts. The headrest is adjusted by turning the nuts into and out of each other to raise and lower the headrest in the vertical direction. The use of the micrometer to adjust the height of the headrest allows the L-shaped plates to be easily turned and adjusted at a given tolerance. In addition, the accuracy achieved is not subject to the variations which often occur during the mass production of parts. A predetermined amount of accuracy can be obtained. Since the headrest is able to be adjusted by a person sitting in bed rather than an outside service person, this allows the headrest to be quickly adjusted even with one hand. The headrest is easily adjusted and serviced. The headrest has a simple, inexpensive construction.Friday, November 29, 2007 I should know better than to look at the RPP site from work.
