That is great news because we can use a single dose of the viral vaccine, and not live attenuated virus, as we would with traditional polio vaccines, to give widespread protection. Developmental biology: Mechanisms of limb regeneration in frogs. To investigate the mechanisms of limb regeneration, we generated an avian model system that allowed us to study limb regeneration in an organism that heals rapidly after limb amputation. Recent studies have suggested that limb regeneration is possible in frogs. We studied the mechanisms of limb regeneration in frogs and discovered many distinct and important roles for molecules that are also important during embryonic limb development. In particular, we found that the fibroblast growth factor (FGF) and transforming growth factor beta (TGF- β) signaling pathways play crucial roles in limb regeneration. Our results show that the FGF and TGF- β signaling pathways function at different points in the regeneration process. FGF signaling is important for generating the initial mesenchyme, which forms the blastema and is required for initiating limb regeneration. We showed that the FGF signaling pathway is also essential for the growth of the blastema, but not for subsequent tissue-specific differentiation. In contrast, TGF- β signaling is required at several points in the regenerative process. These include regulating the shape and pattern of the blastema, and for the reformation of bones and cartilage. We also found that FGF-9 signaling is important for the survival of limb-restricting cells near the anlage at the limb bud stage. The results of the studies described here will provide important insights into the mechanisms of limb regeneration.
