An in vitro study of the mechanism of interference with a collagen-elastin composite polymer interface by plasma proteins. When a collagen-elastin polymer is exposed to plasma, a proteinaceous film forms on the surface. The mechanism of this film formation was investigated in the present study. The model involved the application of plasma to collagen-elastin composite layers supported by a plastic substratum. The morphology of the protein films formed on the layers was analyzed and quantitatively determined by measuring the amount of protein deposited on the surface. The interaction between film-forming proteins and the composite layers was found to be dependent on the gelatinization temperature of the elastin component. Changes in protein conformation, most likely induced by changes in the structural environment of the protein as a result of gelatinization, were associated with the observed shifts in the functional and structural properties of the protein films formed. Thus, changes in the crystalline and/or amorphous structure of collagen were reflected in the changes in the surface viscosity, water binding capacity, and fibril spacing of the protein films formed on the composite layers.
